Renewables:	South Korea is the fifth-largest net importer of oil in the world, and a significant importer of liquefied natural gas (LNG). Oil makes up the greatest share of South Korea's total energy consumption. South Korea will raise its share of renewable energy in power generation from 1.0 percent presently to 1.7 percent by 2011. This will be achieved through a five-fold increase in green energy investments by the country's nine state-owned energy companies. Green energy investments for 2009-2011 will total 2.35 billion USD for the nine companies; Korea Electric Power Corp, Korea Water Resources Corp, Korea District Heating Corp and six power generating companies. South Korea has also pledged to invest two percent of its annual GDP in environment-related industries over the next five years. The Ministry of Strategy and Finance said that effective September 23, 2009, duties will be cut by 50 per cent on 31 components and other equipment used to produce renewable energy. It will apply to 21 items used in the generation of solar energy, seven for wind power, two for geothermal and one for hydrogen fuel cells. In May 2007, Korea broke ground for the world's largest solar plant. At the same time, the city of Incheon, west of Seoul, said it would build the world's biggest tidal energy plant by 2014. The plan calls for connecting four islands with a 7.8-kilometer, or 4.8-mile, barrier and installing dozens of turbines that will harness the energy of powerful tidal waves.
